DESCRIPTION: (Applicant's Abstract) Various chemical stimulants can stimulate the mesocortical dopaminergic mesolimbic pathway. After using these stimulants acutely, they are sometimes followed by a period of abstinence, during which their subjective or physiologic responses to stimulants can be reduced or eliminated. Such abstinence is, however, often never achieved. The longer the stimulant abstinence, the less likely it is that the individual will return to the pre-treatment level of response to stimulants. In order to understand why the initial response to stimulants can be enhanced by acute pretreatment and then be reduced or lost over subsequent periods of abstinence, brain regional changes in density, affinity, and kinetics must be measured with radioligands that can distinguish between [3H]dopamine and [3H]norepinephrine. The long-term goals of this grant are to understand how stimulant binding sites are induced by amphetamine and cocaine in mesocortical and mesolimbic systems, and what role such sites play in the control of behavior in these two brain regions. The studies proposed here will use [3H]spiroperidol to measure the binding and uptake of dopamine in the nucleus accumbens and in the prefrontal cortex of rat brains. If spiroperidol binds preferentially to dopamine over norepinephrine, then the distribution of [3H]spiroperidol binding in these two regions, as well as the kinetics of [3H]spiroperidol binding, will distinguish between dopamine and norepinephrine. If spiroperidol binds to the dopamine transporter, then its binding will be less in pre- than post-synaptic sites, and if it binds to the norepinephrine transporter, then its binding will be less in post- than pre-synaptic sites. The form of [3H]spiroperidol used will be taken from the radiolabeled-spiroperidol of Wu et al., 1982. The specific aims are to: 1) synthesize [3H]spiroperidol in sufficient quantities and quality for all studies; 2) determine the specificity of [3H]spiroperidol binding; 3) measure the equilibrium binding and kinetic parameters of [3H]spiroperidol in the two brain regions; and 4) measure the level of dopamine transporter and the level of the dopamine D2 receptor in the two brain regions

How to Make Painting a Row-by-Row Challenge Thinking about or actually painting a row-by-row, around-the-world-in-one-go journey? You're certainly not the first to think of it, and if your brush felt a little sluggish while staring at map and determined deadlines on your phone, then today's tutorial on how to paint a row-by-row painting challenge is for you! The ancient art of mural painting is certainly one of the most ancient, yet one of the most modern, arts known today. You might not know it, but if you're heading to a cruise ship, a train station, or even a bar, you've likely seen the work of talented artists. And if you've been curious how these artists do it? Well, paint a wall and see for yourself! Painting a row-by-row painting challenge is no easy feat, but it's one you can do if you start planning your project well ahead of time and work in a small and easily manageable space. Whether you want to paint an elaborate mural, a pithy quote on a book cover, a scene from a long-awaited tour, or a whole bunch of 'em, take a look at the following blog post to find out how to paint a row-by-row painting challenge. How to Create an Outstanding Row-By-Row Painting Challenge Once you've decided on your route and the location of your project, you'll first need to figure out which tools you'll need to paint a row-by-row challenge. Think of your tools as the passport to your project -- everything from the quality of your brushes, colors, and paint to the materials you have at your disposal and the preparation of your canvas are all part of what you'll need to complete the task. If you don't have all of the right tools, you won't be able to complete your masterpiece. Before you begin your row-by-row challenge, you'll need to first decide on how big the canvas is going to be. This may sound a little bit silly, but it's actually important. You should not try to paint any sort of mural on a canvas that is too small. You won't be able to fit a lot of detail in a small space, so you won't be able to see the end result and, as a result, will be disappointed with your painting.
